“As you were saying about Pol Pot, those who have seen Cambodia don’t like to think of a Cambodian government.” SUMMARY Speaking before about the difference between the Pol Pot of the Khmer Rouge and the government of Hun Sen, who is the current prime minister of Cambodia, Timour Hruby argues that the strong man of the Khmer Rouge regime is still very much alive today. He argues that the regime instituted by the Khmer Rouge cannot be equated with a “regular” government in terms of democratic accountability. As such, if it were to undertake any military operations today, they would immediately be condemned by the international community, Timour argues. He makes it clear that Hun Sen, who is the strongman in Cambodia, is not democratically accountable to anyone. He makes this point by explaining that the entire regime is controlled by him and his family, thereby ensuring that he does not have to explain his actions to anyone. He explains the nature of how the regime, by and large, operates. He concludes by explaining that although Hun Sen holds the power, the top leadership in the regime is not afraid to step out of line, and that the chances of this happening are not as remote as they used to be.
