I want to count how many of those PNG files are located within the subdirectory. Is there a way to do this on the command line in Mac OS? I want to produce something like this in the terminal: subdirectory: 12 PNG images 16 PNG images ... A: The solution I came up with was to first find out the total number of PNG files in the subdirectory, which I accomplish using this command: du -x -a |

grep -oE "\.png$" | wc -l I then take this total and divide it by the number of PNG files found in the subdirectory to get the percentage of files found: du -x -a | grep -oE "\.png$" | wc -l | perl -ne 'print($1/$2 * 100), "%: $2 PNG images found: " if /$1/' | grep -v '%: 0 PNG images found' | grep -v ': 0 PNG images found' | sort -n This solution isn't particularly elegant, but I don't have much experience using perl or bash in the terminal, so I'm not sure if there is a better way to do it. Q: Test Class Programatically I have a trigger that fires off successfully, then I'm trying to create a manual test class to reproduce the error that is being d0c515b9f4
