The present invention relates to a method of processing plastic food containers, such as, plastic drink containers. More specifically, the present invention relates to a method for preventing the formation of sink marks and/or streaks in plastic food containers, such as, plastic drink containers. In the method of the present invention, a surface of the food container is continuously vacuumed prior to and during the baking operation. Conventional plastic food containers, such as, plastic drink containers, are typically baked after they are filled with food products. Typically, for example, in the case of a plastic drink container, as the plastic drink container is being filled, food particles therein are directed through a vent that is located near the bottom portion of the container. The food particles fill the vent and thereby provide a means of venting air from inside the container as the food particles are filled. Although the food particles provide a means of maintaining positive pressure inside the container, they also introduce contaminants and air into the interior of the container. More specifically, the food particles introduced into the container are not uniformly distributed. As a result, the area near the bottom of the container is generally subjected to a greater volume of food particles than areas of the container that are generally farther from the vent. In other words, the bottom of the container generally receives a greater volume of food particles than other areas of the container.
