The Chrome team, themselves, mentioned that one of the more major challenges of WebRTC is the understanding how it fits into the tag and what kind of data is uploaded to the server. This is a very important and tricky part of the standard that's being defined now. My colleagues and I at Integrator ([are working on a set of libraries that are intended to make the WebRTC pieces more straightforward (e.g., WebRTC SSI). You can see the SSI pattern in action with this example - the idea is to use JavaScript to transfer captured audio and video to a server. This comes with a few limitations right now - mainly that this only works in Chrome, it's not as efficient as native webrtc, it only supports A-Law 595f342e71
