The increasing incidence of hip and knee replacement surgeries has contributed to the demand for implants with maximum joint surface coverage. Achieving adequate bony fixation is vital for optimal bone-implant interface. In this study, Ti6Al4V sintering was used as a method to increase surface roughness on the Ti6Al4V used in joint implants. In the present study, roughened Ti6Al4V samples were prepared by mixing particulate powder of Ti6Al4V with Ti6Al4V particle powder, sintering at 900 °C for 1 h and then grinding in the presence of powder of alumina. The Ti6Al4V samples were subjected to surface polishing with different compounds and etching using different solvents. Interference reflection microscopy (IRM) was used to evaluate the surface roughness. ICP was used for the Pb content determination of the Ti6Al4V samples. The samples were also subjected to X-ray diffraction and the resulting XRD pattern were fitted with the JCPDS card. The antibacterial activities of Ti6Al4V surface treated with different compounds were determined against Streptococcus Aureus (SA) and Staphylococcus Aureus (SA). The Ti6Al4V samples were then characterized to determine the morphological and structural properties. The surface roughness of the prepared samples was analyzed by IRM. The XRD patterns of the Ti6Al4V sintered powder samples indicated a clear peak for the (200) reflection of the hexagonal face-centered cubic phase. The area of the peak increased with the addition of PbO, and it was clear that the PbO concentration of the mixed powder had a significant effect on the area of the peak. The antibacterial activities of the Ti6Al4V samples treated with the various compounds against SA and SA were determined. The minimum inhibitory concentration (MIC) values ranged from 50.4 to 125.0 μg/mL. The obtained results showed that the PbO-Ti6Al4V samples exhibited a higher antibacterial activity.
