My database is ~10GB. Now I've upgraded to SQL Server and am getting this error: Cannot connect to database "TestDbName" due to compatibility level 0. The server supports the compatibility level 120. Either move the database to a new server, or use a higher compatibility level for the server, or upgrade the compatibility level of the database to 120 or higher. I've noticed a lot of references to putting the compatibility level in the connection string. But it looks like I've already set it in the connection string so why isn't it working? I have added to the connection string as follows: I have also checked the connection string and compared it to my working localDB connection string and they are the same. I am not seeing where it specifies the compatibility level. I am running.NetCore 2.2 and.Net Framework 4.5

Perhaps it is a bit of both. We now think that the great crustal mountain range that traverses the coldest, driest region in the world, Antarctica, is actually a fragment of another, colder planet. The South Pole is an island, seabed and all and is a key landing site on this planet, the one we live on. The South Pole is the only place on Earth that is never covered by snow. It is at the tip of the most southerly continent, and sits at the most southerly point of all the world’s oceans. The continent of Antarctica, due to its proximity to this land, and so isolated, is of such size that it is the largest continent on Earth. It’s also of such vulnerability and remote influence that it is the only continent that is in danger of being completely overrun. The landmass of Antarctica is the continent is 22% larger than that of Africa, and nearly 3% larger than that of Australia. And it’s not all desert. In the same way that Africa is not all desert, and Australia is not all desert, Antarctica is also not all desert. Indeed, 75% of the landmass of Antarctica is sea, and the vast majority of that sea is part of the Antarctic Ocean. The open ocean, like the Sahara, is a huge, featureless expanse that is further segregated by numerous ice shelves and other massive ice blocks. Between 1820 and 1830, Adrien de Gerlache, a French explorer aboard the ship the Belgica, discovered the southernmost point on Earth, now know as the De Gerlache Point. This point is five-hundred miles from the South Pole. The Belgica was the first vessel to reach this point, in 1820, and took along several scientific missions. The first expedition was the Neptune, a Russian research vessel. On the Neptune, which had been blown off course and landed in the Antarctic Ocean, was the famous scientist 0cc13bf012

Doc : map> All the lists are of same size. So I have obtained the document without deleting the elements. But a lot of time has passed since the document creation and I cannot remember every element. Now I need to find the document element for a given column without knowing the entire document. I know that if this was an array, I would use Binary Search. But I am not sure about maps. I am using Java 8. A: I think your question is: Given a search element, find the row in a map from an index in that row to the index in the list of the list element in that row. The simplest way is to use Java 8's binary search for that kind of problem. Suppose you already have a row index (it's just an integer, and it represents the row number of the row containing the element, and I assume it's smaller than the row count of the document), and you want to find the index of the list element. The index is the position of the list element in the array, so the index is an integer between 0 and the length of the array. You have a value to find in the array, so you're looking for the point where the value is in the correct half of the array. You don't know the value to find, but you do know it's in the array. So you take the midpoint, and perform a binary search on the smaller half of the array. If the value you're looking for isn't in the smaller half, it must be in the larger half, so you mark that half as being searched, and start looking in that half. If the value you're looking for is not in the array, then the value is in the larger half of the array, so you can just go to the larger half of the array and start from where you left off. For each step of the binary search you keep track of whether you've found the value to find, and how far you're into the array. When you mark the half of the array you're looking
