Association Between Serum Vitamin D Level and Symptom Severity in Chinese Patients With Systemic Lupus Erythematosus. This study investigated the association between vitamin D level and disease activity and symptom severity in systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) patients and explored the role of vitamin D in SLE. We included a total of 113 inpatients with SLE and 87 healthy controls. Demographic characteristics, including age, sex, and body mass index (BMI), and laboratory tests, including hemoglobin, albumin, C-reactive protein, complement, serum vitamin D level, 25-hydroxyvitamin D, vitamin D receptor, and calcium were collected. Disease activity was measured by the SLE Disease Activity Index 2000 (SLEDAI-2K). Statistical analyses were performed using Spearman correlation analysis. The vitamin D levels of the SLE group were significantly lower than those of the control group (22.56 ± 8.27 ng/mL vs. 30.36 ± 11.39 ng/mL, $P < 0.001$).
