It is one of the most remarkable turnarounds in history. Donald Trump, however, is planning a parade. According to the Independent, the president has called for a July 4th parade on the National Mall to honor the "families and supporters of our war fighters." There's no reason to delay. There's no reason not to stage this event. A little over two weeks ago, on the same day Donald Trump took office, he also rolled back a key piece of America's military strategy. Under his guidance, America has been at war against ISIS and radical Islamism in the Middle East for the past 16 years. For the first time since 2001, the United States is actually withdrawing from the endless conflict. Trump's foreign policy was presented as a break from the status quo but now the traditionalist coalition is engaged in a huge battle to keep that promise. The goal is to protect the country and maintain the international order. An America which withdraws from the conflicts in the Middle East is not the same America that has been fighting those wars for the past 16 years. Under President Obama, America was at war not because of Osama bin Laden but because the previous administration chose not to intervene in Syria after former president Bashar al-Assad used chemical weapons on civilians. The goal was to preserve the civil war that the previous administration set in motion, and to prevent the rise of a dictator that would lead to the jihadist caliphate. This was the opportunity that the administration was prepared to give up on. President Trump rolled back that strategy. He not only withdrew U.S. support for the rebels, but he also promised to cut off American support for our allies. And his rollback was evident during the U.N. Security Council meeting on Syria on Tuesday, in which Trump's administration blocked a resolution calling for Bashar al-Assad to face the International Criminal Court. In a diplomatic deal, Russia blocked a U.N. resolution which would have empowered the ICC to investigate war crimes committed by Syria. This is the same Russia that played
