Every page that I touch for my business involves design and coding. For instance, let's say I want to add a new button style to my CSS. Or maybe, I want to change the colour of a button. Either way, finding a way to do this is complicated: it involves thinking about the variables available to me , and then fiddling around until I find a way to propagate these to all elements on my site. I know that this method is wrong because it's not scalable, and it certainly doesn't provide us with a better mental model on how to create complex designs. It creates a layer of complexity that developers must understand in order to achieve greatness. The first problem is all the tool palettes that appear at the top of the image when the user chooses to add a new style, for example a gradient.
